

At the residence of his son, A. L. Hutchison, Sunday night, Nov. 24, 1912, J. M. Hutchison, aged 82.

Over twenty years ago, the deceased and family removed from Tennessee to Mississippi, settling in this vicinity. He was successful in the truck business, retiring some years ago to enjoy the sunset of life in ease and quiet. Mr. Hutchison was a gallant Confederate veteran, having entered the army of the South as a member of Company E, 155th Tennessee Infantry. He served with fidelity throughout the long and bloody struggle and won for himself the high esteem of his comrades in arms. He died quietly and painlessly after a wasting sickness, which sapped his vitality. For many weeks the end had been expected by his family, but by dint of great will power he combatted the ravages of old age, yielding only when strength was exhausted. He sinks into the grave with esteem of all who knew him. His manner and mode of life made him many friends, who will bear in fond remembrance the virtues he possessed in such rich quantities.

To the surviving wife and children, The Meteor expresses its condolence, for the loss of one who for many decades had been a faithful husband and indulgent father.
